NEW-HOME PROJECT PROFILE

Nova a Canadian first for Chinese company

Tower residences are the latest signal of growing overseas interest in Richmond, city hall says

BY MICHELLE HOPKINS

The commercial district in the heart of Richmond, known as the Golden Village, has grown exponentially over the past two decades, attracting both commercial and residential developers. Now, with the 99-unit Nova project, the Golden Village neighbourhood has attracted a high-profile property developer from China: Sunshine International Holdings Ltd.

Nova will mark the Canadian debut for Sunshine Holdings, a developer of large residential and commercial properties across China. However, the development in Richmond — the city has an Asian population that now stands at about 60 per cent of its total — will not be its last here, says Stephen Kwok, manager for Anson Realty Ltd.

"The reason the principal chose B.C. for his first property development is because he has travelled extensively in Canada, and Vancouver is one of his favourite destinations," Kwok says. "He sees great potential in B.C., and more specifically Richmond, because he mainly targets his developments to Asian communities."

Sunshine Holdings' entry into the local development scene is reflective of something of a new direction in city building, indicates Richmond director of development Brian Jackson. He says that although local developers are behind most of the new residential projects in Richmond, the city is increasingly attracting developers from all over the world.

Kwok believes one of Nova's biggest selling points is its location at Park Road and Buswell Street, one that is attractive to young urban professionals, seniors and downsizers.

"It's close to all the amenities, including Richmond Centre [mall], with easy access to rapid transit," Kwok says. "I believe it's the first building in Richmond that is this central to everything.

"This area is prime for redevelopment and walking distance to the Canada Line's Brighouse station."

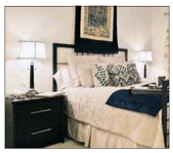
Retirement dreams

Kensington Park, a Maple Ridge apartment development, is a golden-years' opportunity for Dan and Isable McPherson. 'My brother-in-law in Whitehorse bought a couple of properties a while back, and he's using them as a means of supplementing his income as a contractor,' Dan says. 'It got us to thinking it would be a good idea.'



First columns for 2011

Challenges to the measurement of the value of nature have existed for as long as "we" have attempted the measure, Kim Davis observes. However, an increasing number of assessment tools have become available to help ecological bean-counters better quantify "natural capital" and the economic implications of losing ecosystems.

Twice each year, the Greater Vancouver Home Builders' Association organizes seminars for homeowners thinking about or undertaking renovations. The nearly 300 people who attended the fall gathering also completed a questionnaire from which association CEO Peter Simpson has crafted a state-of-the-(renovation)-nation assessment. BY CLAUDIA KWAN

The Kensington Park condos in Maple Ridge come standard with stainless steel kitchen appliances, plus kitchen cabinets and doors made of solid wood.

At 53, Dan McPherson isn't quite ready to retire from his job as a builder of aluminum boats, but he is trying to plan ahead. Part of his plan is to invest in a rental property for the first time.

"My brother-in-law in Whitehorse bought a couple of properties a while back, and he's using them as a means of supplementing his income as a contractor. It got us to thinking it would be a good idea," he says.

Instead of looking around the Sunshine Coast, where he and his wife Isabel live, McPherson has his eye on the new Kensington Park condominium development in Maple Ridge, which will go to market later this month.

Part of the geographical jump comes from the potential he sees in the area.

"I like it because of the way Maple Ridge has opened up," McPherson explains. "I was there a few months ago, and drove up over the [Golden Ears] bridge. I just saw a huge potential for growth."

McPherson also likes the lower real estate prices in Maple Ridge — relative to Vancouver — which makes the prospect of buying a rental property a little more comfortable.

He is also acquainted with Ryan Hartt, one of the real estate agents in charge of marketing the Kensington Park development. In conjunction with partner Richard Burleigh, they are selling the development under an ambitious tag line: "The best condos ever built in Maple Ridge."

Questioned about the boldness of the statement, Burleigh says they can back it up.

"For instance, there's been a ton of work done to minimize how sound travels between the units. It's a wooden building, but what they've done here is put down the joists, put down ¾-inch sheets of plywood, a half-inch-thick sheet of foam, foamcrete, a sound barrier, and then laminate flooring, or padding and then carpeting," he says.

Architect Geoff Lawlor says the construction crews also took care to surround individual power outlets with insulation.

The extensive steps to limit sound travel added an extra five to 10 per cent to the cost of construction, but Paul DaDalt, vice-president of developer Quadra Homes, thinks it's worth it.

"One of the things we hear the most from buyers who are transitioning from a single-family home when they come to a multi-family residence is that 'it's so noisy!' We decided we didn't want that to be a concern," he says.

DaDalt says they know empty nesters don't like maintenance fees, so in an attempt to ease reluctance around paying them, the developer is including a year of free Internet and cable television service.

In the suites, there are no upgrades available; stainless steel kitchen appliances and energy-efficient front-load washers and dryers are standard. The kitchen cabinet doors and doors within the suites are made of solid wood.

Burleigh notes that the developer also invested in a water-filtration system that will remove silt before the water enters the building, hopefully extending the life of the plumbing by at least 10 years.

Hartt and Burleigh believe a wide segment of the population will be attracted to Kensington Park, including downsizers, first-time buyers, investors, and those who want more value for their money. There's a 60/40 split between one-bedroom and two-bedroom units, and aside from a two-bedroom-and-den apartment that's priced at $304,900, every suite sells for less than $300,000.

"You get two times the home for half the price compared to Vancouver or Burnaby," says Burleigh. "Put it this way: If you put 10 per cent down on our most expensive unit, you would be paying less than $1,200 a month to live there – that's including the maintenance fee." (Of course, such payments would depend on interest rates and the length of the mortgage terms.)

The marketing team is also pitching the idea that Maple Ridge is more central than urbanites might think. A 15- or 20-minute drive will take people to 200th Street in Langley for shopping, or to Coquitlam or Port Coquitlam for dining.

Architect Lawlor has lived in Maple Ridge since 1999, where he moved to a 35-acre spread to keep horses. The hiking trails of Golden Ears Provincial Park are about 10 minutes away.

Kensington Park is on the edge of Maple Ridge's downtown core in an area going through a transition from single-family homes to increased density. A property two doors down has a sign on the front yard indicating it is set to be zoned for an apartment building, as well.

City planners were concerned the neighbourhood would resist the introduction of the condos, so wanted to soften the look of the building from the street. In the front, the building rises to three storeys, while the back rises to four.

Those third-storey suites in the front have vaulted ceilings that soar to 4.5 metres. Lawlor has also designed some of the two-bedroom units to have dual master suites with ensuite bathrooms and walk-through closets.

Burleigh and Hartt are predicting the development will sell out in 45 days after sales formally launch on Jan. 29.

After a walk-through of the building, which is still under construction, Dan McPherson said he's confident in the quality of the workmanship and that he's getting value for his dollar. He also believes it won't be that hard to rent the suite out, since demand will be there as Maple Ridge continues to grow. In fact, he's banking his retirement on it.
